“How to Publish”

“Moderated Mediating Effects in Organizational Research – Best Practice Analytical Procedures”

“Gamification in Management Education”

“How to Navigate Academia: Insights from Early Career Researchers”

“How to respond to Examiner’s feedback”

“Curriculum Co-Design with Industry and Students”

“Systematic and Scoping Reviews: What’s the difference and why do them?”

“Networking 101 – making the most of your conference experience”

ANZAM also held a specific networking event in July for ANZAM Associate members and a session “HDR to ECA” in early October.

We still have two sessions coming up:

NOVEMBER “Stop making the quizzes so difficult, B*TCH”: Teaching Evaluations and effects on early career academic’s wellbeing”

Registration links to these two sessions are below.

A big thank you to those who have presented and those who have participated. The professional development program is an important part of what ANZAM offers to members and beyond, as such we are starting to build the program for 2024.

Do you have an interesting topic/idea that you would like to run a professional development webinar for the ANZAM membership in 2024? The webinar can be related to teaching, research, HDR’s, or career development. This is a brilliant opportunity to contribute to the membership and most importantly to share your expertise with others. If you want to discuss the opportunity, can you please reach out to Justine Ferrer, our Chair of our Education and Engagement Committee, justinef@deakin.edu.au

Research must be communicated to other scholars, industry practitioners, and the public to have meaningful impact. Publicising published academic research through media outlets can help you to reach the widest possible audience and track your engagement.

Writing for public consumption presents a unique challenge, and learning to pitch a compelling story for your target audience is critical for engagement. Engaging with the media exposes you to certain risks. Learning to recognise the traps and pitfalls of working with journalists, government, industry, and members of the public will help avoid reputational damage for you and your institution.

Striking a balance between academic rigour and practical relevance is a challenge for any academic working on applied research. Building productive relationships with industry, while retaining your position as a researcher with valuable expertise is essential in achieving this balance.

JMO Special Issue-Call for Papers

Authentic Leadership: 20-Year Review

Guest Editors:

Kevin Lowe, PhD, The University of Sydney, kevin.b.lowe@sydney.edu.au

Andrei Lux, PhD, Edith Cowan University, a.lux@ecu.edu.au

Deadline for Submissions: 30 June 2024

The most recent Special Issue on authentic leadership was published in Leadership and edited by Iszatt-White et al. (2021). Their focus echoed the times, following the critique by Alvesson and Einola (2019) and the subsequent exchange between Gardner et al. (2021) in The Leadership Quarterly, which set the scene for an impassioned critical retrospective of the shortcomings of authentic leadership theory. There was an appetite for this kind of work at the time but given the critical and backward-looking emphases of the Special Issue, it did more to encourage scholars to reconsider the merits of authentic leadership, than it did to advance the field.
